[ASK FARNOOSH]

[00:01:24.5]

FT: Welcome back to So Money everyone, it's Friday. I brought back on our friend of So Money, Sophia Bera. She is the founder of Gen Y Planning, it's a financial planning service for people primarily in their 20's and 30's all across the country. She's my friend, she is excellent at what she does, check her website out at GenYPlanning.com. Sophia, are you there?

[00:01:50.9]

SB: I am, so excited to be here Farnoosh. It's great to be back, thank you.

[00:01:55.8]

FT: It's been a long, long spring. It's all I can say. We were supposed to have nice weather, it's been raining. I put on a sweater today. I almost put on my UGG boots. I don't know about you

Sophia? You're all the way in Austin. I hate you. But up here in New York, it's ridiculous like this morning I went to get coffee with my son. I put him on the stroller and he had on his Christmas sweater, a parka and boots and I could tell you he was still cold and I regretted taking him out but I needed to get my coffee and I ran out of Keurig pods.

You can call that So Money, maybe it's not but I think that Keurig pods saved my life. It means that I save money and it's not the most environmental thing but in our household, it's what gets us through the day and it's cheaper than buying coffee. But anyway, all this to say TGIF and thank God Sophia you're here on the show. Sophia Bera everybody, a round of applause. I wish I have one of those buttons that going to get applause.

SB: That would be great.

[00:02:55.3]

FT: But we're all doing the golf clap over here at So Money. We love having you on the show. You are one of our trusted financial advisers who really understands the millennials like nobody. I mean it's your job. Your website is called Gen Y...

[00:03:09.5]

SB: Planning.

[00:03:10.5]

FT: Planning.

[00:03:10.9]

SB: There you go, I'll fill in the blanks.

[00:03:12.4]

FT: Yes, Genyplanning.com. I was going to say, “gen y x words?” No, no, no, genyplanning.com. I get these question every day, they come in the bag loads questions to my inbox. I am trying to get up to speed everybody. I have people tweeting me like, “Well you haven’t answered my question yet.” I’m like, “Just keep listening. I am getting to everything as fast as I can,” and with the help of trusted experts like Sophia. Because truth be told, I don’t have all the answers, you know? I’ll be honest, I don’t know everything and especially when it’s really technical right?

[00:03:39.0]

SB: What?

[00:03:41.0]

FT: Yeah, I’m human.

[00:03:45.0]

SB: But you’re Farnoosh?

[00:03:46.1]

FT: I’m imperfect, I know. I know a lot of things about a lot of things but I don’t know all the answers and you’ve got to be very careful when you’re giving financial advice, right? So I like to bring on the experts who do this day in and day out and Sophia, you’re one of my favorites so welcome back.

[00:04:01.0]

SB: Thank you so much. That was such a fun introduction Farnoosh. You gave me the giggles over here and then you’re making me happy that I’m not in cold weather anymore.

[00:04:12.5]

FT: Well normally, I would have totally redone that introduction. I would have started over. But I don't care anymore.

[00:04:18.1]

SB: No, that was fun.

[00:04:19.3]

FT: I'm going live. People loved your last visit by the way when you came on right around tax day. It was the Friday before tax deadline and you answered a lot of great questions about what to do if you're a last minute tax filer and people really wrote in and said how much they enjoyed it. So thank you for coming back. How's Austin? I know that you've newly relocated, it shows in Austin as your destination even though you work virtually so that's how much you love Austin. You don't have to live there and you are.

[00:04:48.7]

SB: Anybody who knows me knows that I love Austin and I will try to convince everyone to move here because I just love this city. It's my favorite US city, but we've been having crazy weather here too Farnoosh. It's been 90 and rainy and so I have no idea how you dress for that.

FT: 90 and rainy versus 40 and rainy. I think you win.

[00:05:09.4]

SB: Yeah, I mean at least we can go to the pool, right?

[00:05:13.5]

FT: Oh well, not really worth complaining about. Small problems in the grand scheme of life and today is Ask Farnoosh and so we have some more serious issues at task which is people's financial questions. I am happy say those because my audience is pretty sharp. They're smart people, they are ambitious and these questions, you'll see. It's not basic.

It's like, "I'm doing great, I want to do better" tweaks to their retirement accounts and again, I am happy that you are here to navigate. So let's start with Krista here Sophia. She says that she's interested in investing in target date funds and she wants to know what my view/your view is on target date funds. She says:

[00:05:56.0]

K: "It seems like an easy way to introduce some bonds to my portfolio since I don't currently have any."

[00:06:03.0]

FT: She's 31 and she's looking at some 2050 target date funds and so the easy aspect makes her nervous because they are marketed as, "Oh you know set it and forget it." She says:

[00:06:14.0]

K: "What's the downside?"

[00:06:16.0]

FT: So a primer for everybody, a target date fund basically is a fund that like for example, 2050, that's the anticipated retirement date and so from now until 2050, that target date fund will move to make sure that it's got the right allocation given that you're not going to retire for the next, in this case, 34 years.

SB: Basically, it starts out with a more aggressive asset allocation. So you will have more stocks in the beginning and then it would slowly overtime shift the asset allocation to a more conservative asset allocation, which would be replacing some of those stocks with more bonds. So it might start out 90% stocks, 10% bonds and then a few years later, shift to 85% stocks, 15% bonds until you get towards retirement.

In which case, at that point it would be a much more conservative asset allocation but not a 100% bonds. I think that there is sometimes the misconception that you're slowly switching to 100% bonds and usually even those target date funds that are 20-20 fund often times are 60% stocks, 40% bonds or 50% stocks and 50% bonds. So that is something to be aware of as well.

FT: And good point just in general when you're investing for retirement, people think that once you hit 50 or 60, you should go all to bonds, get rid of stocks. But actually even though you're 60, 65, you should be invested in equities. You're still able to take on some risk because you're not pulling all that money out of it at one time.

[00:07:50.0]

SB: Exactly. So you'd be able to have a more moderate asset allocation if you were planning on pulling that money out over the next 30 years in retirement versus the next five years where you would need more short term cash reserves.

[00:08:04.7]

FT: So what's the downside? This all sounds great, I want to invest in a target date fund but there are obviously some criticism around these.

[00:08:13.3]

SB: So I think one of the problems with target date funds is that they all invest a little bit differently. They have a different mix of stocks and bonds depending on who is administering the fund and managing the mutual fund. So it's important to check what the actual ratio of stocks to bonds is and what types of stocks and bonds are included in that mix.

You'll see some are very simplistic and might only have four different index funds that make up that target date fund. So you might have very little international exposure, for example. Other times, you might have more emerging markets or small cap exposure than you want. So just to take a look at what are the actual funds that make up the target date fund, I think is really important and what percentage of stocks to bonds is that ratio?

Then another thing to look at is the expense ratio that you're charged to own that fund. Often times it's less expensive to invest in index funds because somebody isn't choosing that asset allocation for you like they are with the target date fund, which has a mutual fund manager. So target date funds tend to...

FT: i.e. more expensive.

[00:09:25.8]

SB: Right, so target date funds tend to be a little more expensive to own than if you have to choose your own investment mix with index funds. However, if you are looking for a simpler solution early on in your career especially it can be a good one stop shop for some people who are interested in just getting started, getting going.

I like to say that asset accumulation is more important than asset allocation in your early investing years. It's more important that we just put money into your 401(k) every month rather than be concerned if we have the perfect mix of stocks and bonds. Nothing is ever going to be perfect so just getting close is really good.

I think that that's where the target date funds can really come in handy but just to do your research. Look at the expense ratio. An easy place to look up the expense ratio is on Morningstar.com. You enter the ticker symbol in the box, in the toolbar area and then you're able to click on to the fees associated with the account and that's where you'll find the expense ratio.

FT: Yeah and I think 50 basis points or less is what you want to highlight. I think I read a study that found that the average target date fund expense ratio was around 70 basis points or 0.70% and that's high. That can be a lot of money over the course of 30 years invested. So just try to go for the lowest fees to narrow down your search.

You're 31 years old so it's okay to have a lot of stocks in your portfolio and to make some mistakes and maybe take some additional risk now because you'll have the time to make up for it. Let's move on to Erin, she says her father is thinking of putting some of his money in a trust and making her the beneficiary. Oh isn't that nice?

[00:11:24.4]

E: "What are his options and what are the tax benefits of different types of trust?"

[00:11:30.4]

FT: It sounds like maybe he needs an estate planning attorney in this case. What do you think?

[00:11:35.4]

SB: Yes, that's exactly what I was going to say. This is where it's really helpful to get an estate planning attorney in on your team with your father's financial planner as well and Erin, if you are going to be the beneficiary of the trust, it might be a great idea for you to sit in on those meetings as well.

So that you really understand how the trust works and have a relationship with your father's financial planner and your father's estate planning attorney and you know the ins and outs of that because there's a lot of different trust provisions that he can set up as well. So some trusts are designed so that they're revocable meaning you can change the terms of the trust at any time others are irrevocable which means that he cannot change the terms of the trust.

But there are other tax benefits with irrevocable trusts. One thing for him to note is that if he wants you to have access to the money at different ages, he can make those provisions in the trust as well. Some trusts are set up so that you receive a certain amount of money at age 25, another amount at age 30 and the rest at age 35, for example.

So there's a lot of different flexibility that your father has when it comes to the trust. I think the big thing is finding a great estate planning attorney to be on his team in addition to working with the financial planner to figure out which assets do we want in the trust, what types of accounts? Also, if your father has charitable intent, there might be certain assets that are better for him to gift to charity versus other assets that would be better to gift to you.

[00:13:08.4]

FT: Where do you start to find a good estate planning attorney? We worked with one, he was great. We honestly didn't do a lot of research. He was someone that our financial planner recommended.

[00:13:20.2]

SB: Yeah, I actually think that asking your financial planner is a great place to start because they've worked with a bunch of different estate planning attorneys, CPA's and they usually have an extended network and a lot of times, they have other clients that have worked with that estate planning attorney and so they know and they like their work. I think starting with your financial planner is a great place, talking to your CPA, see who they recommend and then friends and family. Seeing where did your friends go for their estate planning and then interview a couple of people.

The other thing I like is that some cities and some areas offer different classes through like parenting classes and whatnot, well they'll actually have a night where an estate planning attorney comes in and educates people on why a will is important, that's where you name a guardian in your will for a child. What you need to know about trust and just like getting basic estate planning documents in place.

So I would say check if there's local parenting groups and things like that that you're a part of that they might have an estate planning expert that they bring in to speak and educate people on the importance of estate planning documents.

FT: Yeah and Erin your father may already have an attorney or at least whoever helped him set up his will initially, probably also the same person or team that could help him or at least recommend him an estate planning attorney for specifically this trust issue but I like your idea Sophia of having her sit in on those meetings.

[0:15:00.4]

SB: Yeah, I think there's a lot more financial planners that are doing this legacy planning where they're working with grandparents, parents, and grandchildren as part of the entire financial planning process and it allows them to do a lot of advanced tax and estate planning, that other financial planners really wouldn't be able to do unless they had that CPA and the estate planning attorney on their team and then could really also inform all of the family members of the ins and outs of the trust and how those work. So I think it can be a great time to really get involved if that's something that you're interested in if your father's open to that.

[0:15:41.4]

FT: Great advice.

[0:16:43.4]

FT: Okay, let's move on to Katarina, she says she wants to open up a high yield savings account. She wants to know what is it and how different is it from a regular savings account? She wants to open an emergency savings fund, "Ideally one that I'm less tempted to drain," she says. "Any thoughts?"

I think definitely high yield savings account for an emergency fund especially because you're not going to want this tomorrow, it's for the future in the event of an emergency, in the mean time they can be earning a higher yield which is it's self-explanatory, a higher yield savings account.

The reason they can pass on those higher yields to their customers is because typically they're just online banks. There's no brick and mortar expenses, there are a lot more bare bones, they don't really also do a lot of marketing and as a result, their savings they pass on to their customers in the form of higher yields. What are your favorite high yield savings accounts Sophia?

[0:17:41.6]

SB: A good standby is Allied Bank, they have one of the highest interest rates and "the least strings attached" I like to say. So right now Allied Bank is offering a 1% interest rate on their high yield savings account and there's no minimum, which I really like and you'll link into your already existing checking account.

This is great if you don't want to switch banks entirely, you have your payroll already setup going to your checking account, you can literally just go to Allied.com, setup a new savings account, link your checking account and setup a monthly transfer every month so that you have money going from your checking account to your savings account. It will help separate that money from being all at one bank with your checking and savings in the same place.

Right now on your savings account, maybe a brick and mortar bank, you're probably earning like 0.1% on your savings and you could be earning 1%. 10 times more by having it on an online bank which is why it can be really important especially as we're getting into 10, 20, 30 or even $100,000 in cash that people might have that they want to save for. That can really be the difference between a couple of hundred dollars a year that they're missing out on an interest.

FT: It's just a matter of where you're parking your cash and a couple of websites for you to look at Bankrate.com, Nerdwallet.com. Checkout those two websites, they have some great charts and lists. You can search by high yield or whatever you're looking for, CD's, Bonds, it can show you what the various banks that they have relationships with and affiliations with what are their going rates right now. You can do a quick search that way.

All right, let's see, who is next? Bonnie. Bonnie is 33 years old Sophia. She's a former adjunct professor, she now makes $40,000 a year running her family's small business. She has a 453(b) that has $7,000, she has a $3,000 emergency fund and she has $16,000 in student loans at a 0% interest rate, what kind of a loan is that? I'd be interested to find out, have you ever heard of that Sophia? 0% student loan?

[0:19:48.4]

SB: Well it could be because she mentioned that she's continuing to take some college classes so she's deferring her loans right now.

[0:19:56.2]

FT: Right, let me finish the question Sophia. You're jumping ahead. Right, maybe I should read the whole thing before I start asking questions. This is what happens when your guest is smarter than you are. She goes on, she says:

[0:20:11.4]

B: "This rate is because I have continued to take classes at a community college to defer the interest from accruing."

[0:20:17.4]

FT: Okay, got you. She says:

[0:20:19.4]

B: "I rent and I live in southern California where real estate is really expensive. Should I continue to pay down my student loan? It's going to take about two years to get rid of that loan at the current rate or put some of that money towards savings for a down payment for a house, either in a savings account or through rolling over my 453(b) into a Roth IRA and beginning to contribute a monthly amount? And what should that monthly amount be?"

[0:20:46.4]

FT: Wow. So a few questions here, one, should she continue to pay down her student loan? Or put that money towards a down payment for a house? And if it's the house, should it be in a savings account or through ultimately the Roth IRA, which gives you that provision?

[0:21:02.0]

SB: Yeah, lots of great questions in here. So I'm a big fan of paying off the student loans.

[0:21:07.8]

FT: Yeah, I don't like the idea of paying money through your retirement account. That's for retirement.

[0:21:12.1]

SB: Yeah. I also feel like regardless of what the interest rate is on your student loans, I've never had a client say, "You know Sophia, I really regretted paying off my student loans last year. I don't know why I did that." Even if they're just at a few percent, people always feel better paying off their student loans and the other thing is, right now, that 0% interest rate, she's getting that because she's taking classes.

I would maybe kind of refocus on whether you still want to be paying money to take those classes when that money could be going towards paying down your student loans. So I would say like really re-evaluating how you want to spend your cash flow, it sounds like this is a really good time to do that. Aggressively pay off the student loan, I think sounds like a great idea and also build up that emergency savings.

She mentioned she has about $3,000 in emergency savings, which is probably about one month of her net pay, however having that three to six months of net pay saved for emergencies, before she even starts saving for a down payment on a home.

FT: Yes.

[0:21:26.4]

SB: There's nothing wrong with renting. I think right now, we're kind of in this time where people are feeling like, "Oh, I'm in my 30's, I should buy, it's the right thing to do." It's not necessarily. I think that people are getting a lot of pressure from family to buy homes, and I don't necessarily think that that's the best thing for this person's financial situation especially if you have student loans and not a fully funded emergency fund.

I think a Roth IRA is just a great account that you should be contributing to now, especially if you're working for your family business and you no longer have that option of contributing to a work retirement plan if they don't have something setup. Making it a goal to max out your Roth IRA every year with $5,500 is a good idea.

You may also qualify for the saver's credit depending on your income and how much you put into your retirement account. So that's a good tax credit to look into as well. I would say that I love that she's thinking about saving for a down payment on a home but I think that there's some other financial priorities here first in terms of fully funding emergency savings, getting rid of that student loan debt and getting on track for retirement.

[0:23:48.9]

FT: Agree, and making more money perhaps sooner than later? $40,000 in Southern California, 33 years old, I mean, I don't know how you're doing it. I know that's similar to maybe living in New York City — LA, New York City, similar cost of living in some cases. Rent's not as high, but food and everything else, of course you probably have a car too so that's an added expense. I would try to look at ways to increase your income.

[0:24:16.8]

SB: I love that idea Farnoosh. I think that that's one that a lot of people don't think about. I think especially for when you're young in you're 20's and 30's and I think it's a great idea to just really focus on your earning potential because your income stream is your biggest asset. If you can increase your income now, it could really have a huge impact exponentially on your income over the long term.

So while it's really great that you're able to help family out right now, it sounds like you're doing that by discounting your value and how much you could be earning working at another company, maybe doing a similar position. So it might be a good opportunity to look into that as well.

[0:25:01.3]

FT: Yeah, I mean I know so many of my friends who got a lump sum of cash in their 20's or they got an extra job and they were able to save a lot of that money and it became five figures. Look, that's money that you're going to be able to use to ultimately buy that house and suddenly you're in a new income bracket, a new wealth bracket.

I think with your experience as a professor, you're running a business, you have a lot of skills that maybe you're not monetizing all of them. But there are ways out there, there's a market out there for things that you can offer and make money on the side passively and one more question Sophia, I think we have time for, this one is Carrie, also in her 30's, she says she's chronically single, "In my 30's but that's not the problem."

It's true, being single now in your 30's is just the norm. Who cares if you want to get married or not, I think there was actually an article this weekend in the times about just that getting married is not the cap stone of life anymore, it's a corner stone.

[0:26:03.2]

SB: Right.

[0:26:04.6]

FT: It's like, if it happens, it happens, if it doesn't, it doesn't. She says:

[0:26:07.4]

C: "I want to make sure that I'm financially prepared as I get older, just in case I remain single but I'm having a hard time finding money advice for never married singles who aren't younger and expected to marry someday. I have plans in place to tackle my consumer debt and an enormous student loan debt, a small savings and a decent 401(k) and pension.

I want to make sure all aspects of my life are covered. Do you have any suggestions for planning a solo life? I would rather undo or reallocate the money elsewhere should my status change and to wake up in my 60's completely unprepared."

[0:26:42.4]

FT: I love that she's thinking ahead.

[0:26:44.3]

SB: I love this question, I think it's great. I'm single in my 30's, so I can totally relate to this question and I think that — I love that she's wanting to be financially independent regardless of whether she's married or single later on and I think that that's really important. She has a lot going on. I really think that she could benefit from talking to a financial planner, especially if she's a higher income earner but also has the higher student loan debt.

Because really, working through a plan to pay off the student loan debt, get on track for retirement, pay off the rest of her consumer debt can really help set her up financially by building that basic financial security and if you meet somebody else and you decide that you want to merge your life with a partner, you're just going to be in a better financial position unless you do so.

So I think that she is taking the right steps, I think the first step would be tackling that consumer debt. If you have any high interest rate credit card debt, getting rid of that right away and then also making sure you have emergency savings, building up at least three months of emergency savings and figuring out a plan for those student loans. Do you want to take a look at student loan refinancing options, if their private student loans? And taking a look at are you maximizing your 401(k), and what does your pension look like as well?

This is more of a complex question, I think it would be great for you to talk to a financial planner, come on over to my website, GenYPlanning.com, I love working with clients like you, I have a lot of clients that are single women in their 30's. So I mean I do think there are resources out there and it's just going to take a little bit of digging, but it might be really great to have somebody on your team to help you navigate through that.

[0:28:35.1]

FT: If I may add one more resource to the mix. Last week I was meeting with Sallie Krawcheck in person, she's been a guest on the show for those of you who don't know Sallie, she is a financial female trail blazer, she was at one point one of the most powerful women on Wall Street and has since started a website called Ellevest.com.

Essentially this is a platform for women created by women that helps you get a personalized plan for reaching your goals. Whether it's retirement, whether it's starting that business, whether it's buying that car and all of the above. It takes into account things like not just your risk tolerance but what are the sort of the things that you are willing to trade off to accomplish these goals? What's your time horizon? What are your aspirations?

I think that it's very easy to use, it's actually not open to the public just yet as far as like anyone can sign up, they're taking it by invitation only but go to Ellevest.com to learn a little bit more and the reason I want to recommend this to you Carrie is because you are in many ways their target market. Educated woman in her 30's who's aspirational, who is thinking ahead and is goal oriented.

I would say that one of the biggest gaps outside of the gender income gap is the gender investment gap. Women aren't investing as much as men and frankly, we need money more than men in retirement because we are living longer.

SB: This is so interesting Farnoosh. I haven't heard of this yet. So I just while you were talking signed up.

[0:30:09.1]

FT: Oh good.

[0:30:09.3]

SB: Yeah.

[0:30:10.6]

FT: As I said, they're not open to the public right now. They want to be careful about onboarding because what they're worried about and it would happen I think is like they would just get overwhelmed and they just want to be really thoughtful and Sallie told me she wants to review every single financial plan in the beginning but I think that if the site actually executes everything that in theory it's promising, it's going to be a game changer. So I'm happy to see that there are products out there specific for women, we need them don't you think?

FT: Totally. Just occurred to me that every single question today came in from a female. I just want to thank Carrie and Bonnie and Katarina and Erin and Krista and you Sophia for coming back and sharing all your wisdom with our audience, it's always such a treat to have you.

SB: Thanks so much for having me Farnoosh, it was great to be here.

[0:31:25.4]

FT: Absolutely, everyone go to GenYPlanning.com and Sophia's going to help you out. If you have any other questions, you can ask her but as always, go to Somoneypodcast.com and click on Ask Farnoosh. Thanks again and hope your weekend is So Money.
